Recent economic studies have shown that the rotator cuff problem is the only musculoskeletal condition linked to work absence. The current study showed that the disease was a risk factor for work absence; thus, evidence was found to indicate that the early detection of the rotator cuff disease can decrease the risk of work absence. The finding of the current study is in line with that of previous studies. In addition, individuals with late-onset rotator cuff disease were 1.8 times more likely to be absent than those with early-onset rotator cuff disease, which was similar to a previous study. The current study showed that the prevalence of individuals with late-onset rotator cuff disease was higher among women. This finding is in line with that of a previous study which reported that the prevalence of rotator cuff tendinopathy was higher among women than that among men. The rotator cuff disease may affect one shoulder or both. In a study, it has been reported that 26% of individuals had rotator cuff disease in at least one shoulder, and 12.5% had rotator cuff disease in both shoulders. In the current study, it was found that individuals with disease in both shoulders were 1.5 times more likely to be absent from work than those with isolated disease. This finding is in line with that of previous studies. The strength of the current study is that it evaluated the correlation of work absence and different types of the rotator cuff disease (isolated rotator cuff disease versus disease in both shoulders) in addition to early and late-onset rotator cuff disease. The current study indicated that the severity of the rotator cuff disease, as measured by the ES-DASH score, was a risk factor for work absence. A previous study reported that the severity of disease (measured by the DASH score) was a risk factor for work absence in a sample of individuals with rotator cuff disease. It has been reported that the muscle strength of the shoulder was a risk factor for work absence among individuals with rotator cuff

Maine, which has a progressive reputation, becomes the 11th state to sign the accord, formally known as the Paris Agreement. However, the deal is still far from a binding treaty. A growing number of countries are following Australia’s lead and opting out of the agreement and 28 other countries remain formally in the agreement. Maine’s Senate approved the ratification with a 26-20 vote. The House will take up the Senate’s action in the next few weeks. “To know that we are part of a legacy of a generation, I think it is a really important day,” said Jeff Lambert, a Greenpeace representative in Maine. “It’s exciting for us, we are the signer state and now other states are signing on.” The effort in Maine was spearheaded by Gov. Paul LePage. Republican governors now account for three of the 11 U.S. states to have approved Paris Agreement ratification. Connecticut, Maryland and Massachusetts are also expected to
